Photography and image editing by the pros is an expensive hobby. If you cannot afford the price of Photoshop, you may still be able to get a lot of professional-quality effects in some of the free software programs. GIMP is the popular free software application. It is a perfect tool for beginning photographers and graphic designers, but also has the ability to handle professional applications. If you want to create the look of a print press, then you need a more powerful, sophisticated program than Photoshop or GIMP. Photoshop Elements ($100) is a very powerful, fully featured editor that enables you to manipulate images at a high level. In addition to the editing options for an image, you also have the ability to organize, print, and store multiple versions of your images. What and How to Photograph For the beginner, choosing what to photograph is the most important step of the entire process. The scenery, the background, and anything else that is not the subject of your picture has to be taken out before you begin editing. When you are paying for prints or digital files, your choices will determine not only the price you pay, but also the quality of your images. The best way to determine what you can afford is to spend a little time in front of a camera and experiment with your personal creative goals. Think about what images you would like to make, and whether your needs are a little more creative or a little more utilitarian. While you spend the bulk of your time documenting what you see, you can also spend a little time on your photography education, knowing more about the technical aspects of shooting. You can read about shutter speeds and how to use your camera's flash in Chapter 11. Choosing a camera and a lens You have a number of options for your camera. You can get a simple, dandy kit with a dinky little camera and lens, but this makes a low-quality image. You can get a more professional-quality item that is more expensive, but it will yield more quality. There are a number of quality brands out there, and different brands offer different levels of quality. If you want to be a serious photographer, or if you already have a lot of money to spend on photography equipment, then you may need to spend more on a higher-quality camera and lens. The lenses available for your camera will be the size of the eyepiece in your camera. If you look at your camera, you will

Q: When to use Lambda, When to use POJO? I am developing an android application. In that there is login functionality as well as Registration form. In registration form there is option to add more then one user. I have used multi-select to choose multiple users. There are many many ways to implement multiselect. Lambda as per my understanding when to use lambda, selections.add(c -> c.getName().equals("Chris")); selections.add(c -> c.getName().equals("Dee")); multi-select, as per my understanding multi select can be used to select multiple values from a collection. ArrayList names = Arrays.asList(getStringArray("name"), getStringArray("name2")); MultiSelectAdapter customAdapter = new MultiSelectAdapter(selectListActivity, layoutResourceId, names); and then set the adapter to multi-select. multiselect.setAdapter(customAdapter); I can't decide whether to use POJO or lambda. I would appreciate if anyone can suggest which is better. Thank You. A: Lambdas makes it easier to add logic to your model. While I think the multi-select example is a bit convoluted and unnecessary, an example of something useful with lambdas is the case when you have an API that returns a List (for example) but you only care about the contents of that list once. In that case, you would use a Lambda. Another example is where you have two methods that perform similar tasks on the same data but only one of those should be called at one time. You could use a Lambda to make the decision, and then call one method or the other in the code path of the method that isn't appropriate for that use-case. A: A lambda is more useful if you have some code you want to run that you want to change based on the argument that's being passed to it. In other words, the logic you want to run is different in each case

Q: PHP - change output_encoding to windows-1252 I have a file test.php with the code below. If I run it in Windows, I get the expected German result, if I run it in Linux the results are wrong because Linux uses windows-1252. I think, I have to change the output_encoding to 1252. I would like to know how I can do this. I tried: ini_set('output_encoding', 'iso-8859-1'); ini_set('output_buffering', 0); but it is not working. Any ideas? A: Since Windows is using UTF-8 by default, the problem is that Windows does not use UTF-8 for outputting string data. You can convert between UTF-8 and Windows's native code page 7-bit format, at least for ANSI characters, with iconv: $output_encoding = iconv('utf-8', 'cp1252', $string); This is a Windows 1252 string, after conversion. See the docs for iconv for more info. You can also check the value of the output_encoding PHP config option, which is the encoding used for string data being output. Update If you really mean to output UTF-8 by default, here's an option: $utf8 = mb_internal_encoding(); mb_internal_encoding('utf-8'); Then, when outputting UTF-8 strings, you can just use echo $string; Medical diagnosis is frequently a time-consuming and labor-intensive process. The time and labor consumed usually limits the amount of time that a patient is under a physician's care, and thus, limits the amount of time that a physician can spend with each patient. For example, the diagnosis of a heart attack can be relatively quick for experienced physicians, but even for the most skilled physicians, the diagnosis of many diseases can require 30 minutes or more. Physicians may spend significantly more time on a patient with a complication or problem associated with the disease for which the physician is diagnosing. Unfortunately, many people with chronic diseases, such
