It was former NSW Governor-General Major General Sir John Kerr who, on December 11, 1975, signed the power of appointment of the Queen's representative on the country's nine governors, eight of whom are first-term appointees. As it turns out, the other governor, Dennis Hartigan, died on April 12, 2016, without a predetermined successor being nominated by the Queen. It was a situation that was a constitutional first. The rules associated with the power of appointment pre-dated the change, with the process dating back to the 1688 Letters Patent by which King James II gave King Charles II a pendant power to the monarch. With no direct heir to the throne, Charles' successor would be declared in a variety of ways, which led to a number of options on who might succeed. The issue of succession became a highly publicised and debated topic, with Parliament's involvement and suggestions being the primary option. The government under Lord North's administration was in favour of doing nothing, with Lord Carnarvon, who would take over as prime minister following North's resignation the following June, suggesting that the prince of Wales should succeed the Queen. He was joined by Russell on July 20, when the Commons voted for it. It wasn't until January 5, 1701, when, on the request of the Lord Chancellor, Wentworth, that James swore an oath of allegiance to the child claimant to the throne, that Parliament's view of the succession came to an end. Carnarvon, who under parliamentary pressure was forced out, returned in the chair of Lord Rockingham's government with an alternative to the succession. This was a plan to have the Duchess of Marlborough and her son born after December 25, 1701, to inherit the throne. The government was against the proposal, but it didn't deter the House of Commons from passing it with great speed. George I's first act as King in May 1714 was to back the Royal Marriage Act 1708, which effectively outlawed divorce, with common law marriages being recognised. It was an act that only applied in England and Wales 3da54e8ca3
