- Author: Vic Hargrave, includes links to other useful software/websites. Rest of the Story - Numerous fantastic features that are explained in this review. But before I do, let's take a look at some of the best XHTML editing tools on the market today. The field is crowded, and while there are some good programs out there -- including more expensive ones -- none of them really stands above the rest. With that in mind, here's a look at my top five choices -- as well as my number one. XHTML FAQ Lite Description: XHTML FAQ Lite is a simple, easy-to-use HTML editor. It's designed to allow you to create and maintain XHTML documents quickly and easily and even to take care of some HTML basics like comments and doctype declarations. It's perfect for the person who doesn't know HTML or is completely new to it, and it's also a great choice if you simply need some basic XHTML editing support but don't want to invest in more serious tools. The XHTML FAQ Lite is a direct descendant of the popular HTML FAQ Lite that we reviewed back in February. Of course, it's being updated to include greater support for XHTML and CSS coding and is being refined as well. The only major difference between the two versions is that it's now possible to set up the auto-complete capabilities to use the tag list from one tab (or any tab) and replace it with the tag list from the other (or other) tab. Pros: Simple tool that offers a lot for little money. Great source of information for new users. Good for people who don't know much about XHTML. Provides free maintenance. Cons: Doesn't save automatically. No easy way to switch from HTML to XHTML or vice versa. DigiTool Description: DigiTool is a simple, easy-to-use HTML editor. It's designed to allow you to create and maintain HTML documents quickly and easily and even to take care of some HTML basics like comments and doctype declarations. It's perfect for the person who doesn't know HTML or is completely new to it, and it's also a great choice if you simply need some basic HTML editing support but don't want to invest
