The list is a work in progress; continue to check for more and add them. Our long term goal is to identify genes and mutations that cause acute myelogenous leukemia (AML), and to understand the function of the proteins encoded by those genes. Unfortunately, because of the heterogeneous nature of the AML disease and the poor predictability of response to therapy, the identification of novel AML related genes has not yet resulted in the development of new diagnostic tools or therapies for this disease. We have identified gene products encoded by the AML1 and AML2 loci, the founding members of the RUNX family of transcriptional regulators. Functional analyses of these proteins have shown that they are critical for early hematopoiesis, and that they function in a network of other interacting genes. We have also shown that, within a single AML1-expressing clone, there is a continuum of AML1 gene expression levels and that the highest expressing clones will make the most highly aggressive disease. In addition, the non-sense mutations found in AML1 are 1cb139a0ed
