and more. The present invention relates to ceramic components, and more particularly, to a wound ceramic component having high porosity and an integral, integral tubular metal core. In U.S. Pat. No. 4,614,871, which is hereby incorporated by reference, novel ceramic components are described and claimed which have porosity including a self-supporting hollow tube having two ends and an integral, integral tubular metal core. These components are shown in FIGS. 1 and 2 of the '871 patent and include a metal core 2 which generally has a hollow, substantially cylindrical shape.
The hollow ceramic tube is generally wound such that its longitudinal axis is substantially parallel to the axis of the metal core. The number of windings is selected so that the ratio of longitudinal to circumferential length is substantially larger for the ceramic tube than for the metal core, such that the metal core partially and radially supports the wound ceramic tube at the end portions. The hollow tube portion of the component is filled with a ceramic paste, which is either dispersed in a liquid binder or unbound, to form the desired ceramic component. The ceramic component is thereafter heated to a temperature above the softening point of the metal core and below the ceramic fusing temperature to cause shrinkage of the ceramic in the longitudinal direction. This causes the ceramic paste in the interior to be forced outwards towards the metal core, as shown in FIG. 2. The components of FIGS. 1 and 2 of the '871 patent thus have the ability to exhibit tensile, flexural, and fatigue strength, as well as chemical, thermal, and corrosion resistance. The ceramic components of the '871 patent thus have a number of advantages over other ceramic components. For example, the components are fabricated from a single metallic component having an integral ceramic tube
