Has Junior's Best Since '15,?More School Bids (But Not Enough) Has Junior's Best Since '15,?More School Bids (But Not Enough) The debate over whether a compact commission should increase school enrollment by giving out more high-flier school-bid money, or instead focus more on quality and budget, is over. The four commissioners, who met twice Tuesday, announced at a press conference that they will move forward with the creation of an enrollment diversion program, which gives schools extra money for enrolling students from specific under-enrolled school zones. The commission, led by Mayor-elect A.C. Wharton, Jr., will finalize details on the plan this summer. Wharton said the district "feels at a point where we should be making the fiscal decision to increase enrollment." "We're just trying to find a way to make sure kids are in school," he said. The plan will bypass the school committee, which will be reviewing plans over the next two weeks to set new enrollment zones. The district will be releasing enrollment reports at the end of the month, which would be used to set a new enrollment zone. However, there would not be a cost to the district.

Five school zones will receive an extra 3 percent of their allocation under the plan — Saint Charles, Massachusetts and Eisenhower elementary schools, and Glennonbrook, East Catholic and Lemp high schools. As a result, the amount of money those schools will get will increase. All will need to increase their enrollment by between 8 and 15 students from the current allocation of $3.44 million per school. Those schools have been under-enrolled since before the compact was implemented two years ago. East Alton, Wilson, Taylor and John A. Wilson schools will see their allocation decrease by about $1.5 million, and those schools have been over-enrolled under the current funding formula. The plan will leave Glenbard East alone, making it the only under-enrolled elementary school in the district. The full d0c515b9f4
