Tip When you open an image in Photoshop, a shortcut palette appears along the left side of your workspace, showing your eight most recently opened files. If you press the key, this palette shrinks to reveal your eight recently opened files in the background. Press Shift+ ( +Z) to expand the palette again to reveal all files in your photo library. You can use the various arrow keys to navigate through your file list. The Tools palette contains the following items: * **Brushes:** A range of brush types, including Flat and Glow, are available in the Brush palette. Each brush type has specific attributes, such as size, shape, spacing, and style. You can control brush settings in the Brush panel. You can make a custom brush with any brush or pattern and drag that brush to a layer in your image. You can then use the brush in your image. You can reshape, adjust, and adjust the settings of the brush itself. You can also choose from the eight standard foreground and background colors. To make a custom brush, click the Brush tab at the top of the Toolbox window. Alternatively, click New Brush to access the Brush panel (Figure 10-4 and New Brush \making

The moral and political discourse surrounding eugenics and the occasional murder of the poor and infirm are connected enough to know that it's impossible for two subjects to remain separate. However, it is worth remembering that the earliest proponents of euthanasia were also eugenicists, and, therefore, they were not operating in a vacuum. I believe that most westerners have evolved past the racism and eugenics of the early 20th century, but I can't say that for certain. At any rate, I would love to be proved wrong. The earliest proponent of euthanasia, according to Wikipedia, was the 18th-century Czech philosopher, Mattias de la Barre, a follower of Descartes. The 14th-century Venetian physician, Antonio Benivieni, was inspired by Descartes, and applied his philosophy to ending the lives of the incurably ill. The most oft-cited eugenicist, Dr. Alfred Ploetz, believed that the mentally ill were a danger to society, and he thought that the more mentally ill there were, the more rich and powerful the mental hospital workers would become. His theory was to decamp all the mentally ill from society. Finally, in the 1880s the craze for hunting the poor and ignorant through natural selection reared its ugly head again. Ploetz, who was the editor of the "Deutsche Rundschau", and who was influenced by the writings of the English naturalist, Charles Darwin, knew the same people as Karl Pearson and Sir Francis Galton, and they were all proponents of small government, limited government, "class" and "race" theories, theories of eugenics and orthodoxy, and anti-Semitic ideologies. They were not mistaken in looking for an eugenicist and a murderer behind every accounting, but these beliefs didn't just spring up overnight. Who, then, was the murderer who motivated eugenicists to carry out their euthanasia plans? That is, who was he? The answer is Adolf Hitler. Hitler was never a racist. He was a capitalist, he was a Social Democrat, he was a member of the Christian Social Party, he was a member of the National Socialist German Workers' Party, and he was a professing Christian. He wasn't a Christian without being a Catholic. And, because he was a Catholic, the basis for his belief in euthanasia is in the writings of Thomas Aquinas. In "Summa Theolog

What's New In?

Sounds a bit like an intelligent warning system for an apocalypse scenario in some recent news. From New Scientist: Geologists in Germany have concluded that a giant meteor will strike Earth in 2029, if the planet's atmosphere remains as it is today. They are betting that our atmosphere would clear if the fireballs reached us, and people would be able to work out where the incoming meteor will be. On 11 September 2029, the Large Hadron Collider will be carrying out its final run, and the team would like all of humanity to attend to watch it blow up. Of course, many will claim that the team are over-reacting. But as someone who has read the Findings and Plan of Phaeton essay by Joseph Becker (link) written in 1836, on the meteor that flew over the Earth in 1836, we have already seen what the future will look like when these types of events occur. And we have seen it before. The German scientists have drawn up a database of over 15,000 possible impact points on Earth, but say that because the orbits of comets and meteoroids are hard to predict, there is only a 20 per cent chance of their predictions being right. Therefore, they have also warned that when the fireballs hit the atmosphere they could possibly alter the planet's magnetic field. The scientists, however, do not have all the answers, and in a YouTube interview with German broadcaster ZDF, Dr Stefan Pokorny, who led the German team, says there will be no warning. Because we don't know everything about Earth, they cannot make sure that nothing will happen. Numerous fires and earthquakes are likely to follow such a massive collision. The fireballs will burn the air's oxygen, leaving the Earth without enough of this essential gas to breathe. [...] The massive fireball that detonated over the Russian city of Chelyabinsk last February, for example, was estimated to be about 1.5 miles (2.5km) in diameter. A similar explosion would be a source of energy equivalent to about 1.2 times the total power generated by the global nuclear industry. [...] "The population of the world will have to decide whether they want to watch or not," says Pokorny, but adds that humanity's history of watching catastrophes like this unfold may offer lessons for what to do in similar situations in
