This is an evolution on what EA Sport first showed off in the creation of FIFA 19, but this time it promises better controls than what you saw in FIFA 19. Editor's Note: (July 19, 2:30 p.m. EDT) This post has been updated. EA has clarified that the motion-capture demo is not about the in-game controls, but the gameplay itself. We've replaced some incorrect language in the article with "motion-capture powered" to reflect that, as clarified by the publisher. "All data," EA's Sean Holland said, "is used to support the look and feel of the game." "You are going to see," he added, "the ability to use both, on and off the ball, the controls." In FIFA 22, Holland said, the controls are "bigger, faster and smarter." "You will be able to take control of the ball from start to finish with a single tap on the new touch control feature or a two-button combination like in FIFA 18." That was the promise EA made a year ago when it showed off the new controls in FIFA 19. "We've found that fast, easy-to-use controls make a great core gameplay experience. And that's exactly what this year's FIFA brings," Holland said. "Unlike last year's iteration, we've increased the speed and accuracy of the controls to give the player the ability to feel more connected to the ball and make crisp, clean decisions." What exactly makes the control system different? "That's something you're going to have to play the game with and see," Holland said. "But it includes the new touch control system in combination with the new on-the-ball inputs and the virtual now feature that gives you the ability to use on-the-ball controls as well." According to EA Sports, there are seven main areas of gameplay improvement in FIFA 22. On-the-ball controls are part of the second category, along with the kickoff and other kicks in FIFA 21, and re-balanced scoring to give top teams something to fight for. In FIFA 22, EA wants to improve free kicks, give more power to movement, and give more control on set pieces to teams that are better at set-pieces, like Barcelona. "We've added a third and fourth free-kick option," Holland said,
