Writer's review: What begins as a comedy of slightly implausible coincidences, becomes a profoundly sad and moving human drama. A wide-ranging, comic, and sometimes poignant look at life, love, and loss at the end of the millennium, with elements of magic realism and farce. Vikram Bhatt's debut features a typically heart-tugging comeback performance from his lead actor, in a film that is consistently funny and often touching. Sarfarosh Anil Kapoor's son Anil Kapoor is a naÃ¯ve teacher in a school in Delhi. He doesn't believe in magic, and he does not believe in love. Vikram is a writer and works in a Bollywood movie studio, where he tries to escape from the humdrum. They run into each other and start a comic set of improbably coincidences, involving Vikram's gran and a wizard, who promises to help him. Vikram gets a role in a very popular film, the director of which sets him up with Sarfarosh's daughter. They get married, and all seems fine. Yet things are not what they seem, and Vikram has his doubts that all of this is part of a bizarre routine that he has to go through before being able to see Sarfarosh in person. Meanwhile, Sarfarosh himself is growing up as a teenager, and is drawn more and more towards a mystical healer with whom he has a fleeting but very real connection. He admits to the man that the mystery is driving him crazy and that he is worrying about Sarfarosh, who is out with friends while supposedly on holiday. It turns out that the healer was right all along. Sarfarosh is profoundly hurt and confused by Vikram's and the healer's part in the sudden death of his parents, and is wrestling with unfulfilled longing and hope. A multilayered film with a complex and very human narrative, this is a welcome return to form for Vikram Bhatt after his Mayuri and Chori Chori. The film begins with a bunch of idle high school students playing football in front of a classroom of painted-on students.

They are in the middle of a lesson on George Washington, when the girls realise that one of them, Reshma, has forgotten her homework. She is told off, as is her cousin Sanjay (Deepak
