A 69-year-old man with a history of a myocardial infarction and an implanted pacemaker presented with atrial fibrillation. The pacemaker system had been re-programmed to VVI. An echocardiogram demonstrated a normally functioning right heart and a paradoxically functioning left heart. Additional findings included a decreased left ventricular ejection fraction of 40%, a moderate to severe mitral regurgitation, and an inappropriately elevated atrioventricular valve transmitral gradient. Cardiac catheterization and cardiac magnetic resonance imaging confirmed the presence of a complete AV block and revealed a restrictive tricuspid valve with an excessively tilted and displaced atrioventricular valve. The patient underwent a successful tricuspid valve replacement. This case highlights the importance of recognizing the sick sinus syndrome in patients with right-heart pacemakers and demonstrates the value of echocardiography and cardiac catheterization in the evaluation of these patients.
