the time, and in a related question, I asked why it says at the bottom that my product key is invalid, but if I navigate to the system registry and search for it, it´s there and confirmed working? This installer installs WinKeyFinder.exe to the default location of your current user directory by default, and it will then start WinKeyFinder as an external program. WinKeyFinder then shows a window, containing a product key for Windows installed on your computer. You can then copy the text of this key to a document, text file, spreadsheet, or other application, and WinKeyFinder will not tell you to provide a key. You can use the GUI to enter a product key to see whether it is still valid, or to change an existing key. By pressing cancel in the GUI, WinKeyFinder will exit, or you can select to exit WinKeyFinder from the menu. Win KeyFinder 1.0, 5.5 MBElon Musk was ruffled by Wired's short story about a prototype "spacesuit" for "extended human spaceflight." In the cover story, the tech entrepreneur whose name is synonymous with rocket science is quoted saying that he doesn't want his grandchildren to have to wear one. SpaceX, the private company he founded to build rockets and spacecraft for human missions to the moon, Mars and beyond, is building a series of capsules to carry humans out of low-Earth orbit to the International Space Station, and the company's own laboratories. Wired first published the story about a prototype "spacesuit" for an "extended human spaceflight" in January. In it, Musk is quoted as suggesting that the idea is ludicrous; a piece of junk; and a natural progression to space tourism. He also told a writer for the publication that his reaction to the story was "frustrated" and that the piece was "stupid." "Don't worry," Musk said, "You'll just get spanked by science." On Friday, after Wired published a new story—a more detailed account of the planned "spacesuit"—he upped the ante.
